HOW DO PROBLEMS OCCUR IN YOUR PET'S MOUTH

Food debris, fluids and chemicals of the saliva combined together constitute the perfect environment for bacteria living in the mouth to thrive and form a sticky biofilm on the teeth. This biofilm is what is called plaque. If not frequently removed, bacteria of the plaque will start accumulating minerals that will eventually form a thickening tartar coating around the teeth. They also produce acids that will attack the enamel resulting in tooth decay. As the tartar coating thickens, it will slowly reach areas under the gum and other types of bacteria will start colonizing. This first triggers inflammation (gingivitis) and may give rise to "pockets" in the gums where food debris can also be trapped.

The most obvious side effect of this whole process is well known from pet owners and can appear from the very early stage, that is bad breath. Besides, if not properly addressed plaque and tartar issues will ultimately lead to a breakdown of the bone supporting the tooth, which is why it's fundamental to take care of it right from the start and keep doing so all along your pet's life.
